Gary Winogrand

Winogrand was a street photographer who operated out of the Bronx, New York City. He worked as a freelance photographer and an advertising photographer but he loved the street. He had an ingenious way of shooting a decisive moment where he would focus without looking through the camera.

By guessing how far his subject was he would look at his lens and guess the focal point. He was very good enough at this and got great black and white images time and time again. Winogrand was also known for shooting with a wide angle lens and putting it right in strangers' faces to create black and white dynamic shots. His work will live forever as some of the best street photography images ever created.

Winogrand was always aware of how people fit in spaces as well as how comedy can be found in every aspect of life.

Elliott Erwitt

Moving away from large format photography, Elliott Erwitt primarily shot on 35mm cameras. Erwitt was originally from France and immigrated to the United States to go to college. He worked as a photography assistant in the US army where he honed his skills.

As a photographer, Elliott focused a lot of his attention on street photography and is one of the wildest street American photographers ever to grace the earth. His images are both deep and funny at the same time images, if you like street photography, Elliott Erwitt will blow you away!

His most celebrated photograph is entitled "Afghan Girl" is a simple portrait of a young girl. It is hard to describe how incredible the Afghan Girl photograph is but there is just something so captivating about it. Afghan Girl captured the world's attention and has been one of the most prominent photos to ever grace the cover of National Geographic.

He tried to replicate the photo by photographing the same girl years later but it did not have the same effect. Steve McCurry is still working as a photographer and has spent a lot of his career overseas capturing stunning portraits of common people.

McCurry created a hauntingly beautiful image here.

Robert Frank

Robert Frank was a Swiss-American photographer famous for his book entitled The Americans. Frank travelled across America by car in 1955 capturing the everyday lives of Americans. When his book finally got published and printed in the United States, it was met with criticism.
